

Public Power Week: Safety Powers Our Communities

During Public Power Week, Oct. 4–10, we celebrate the dedicated employees who keep the lights on and help our communities thrive. From lineworkers in the field to office staff supporting daily operations, every role contributes to providing reliable service to the customers who depend on us.

One of the most important ways we serve our communities is by making sure everyone gets home safely at the end of the day.

This week, make safety part of the celebration:

- Look out for one another. A quick reminder, a second set of eyes or a willingness to speak up can prevent an injury.
- Never skip a step. Familiar tasks can still present serious hazards. Follow established procedures, even when you're in a hurry.
- Stay aware. Changing conditions, traffic, equipment and people nearby can introduce unexpected risks.
- Speak up when something doesn't seem right. Stop, ask questions and address the concern before continuing.
- Take care of yourself and your coworkers. Fatigue, stress and distractions can affect anyone. Check in with one another and ask for help when needed.

Public power is built on community, teamwork and a shared commitment to serving others. That commitment starts with protecting the people doing the work.

This Public Power Week, celebrate what we do—and make safety part of how we do it. Because keeping the lights on matters, but getting everyone home safely matters just as much.
